

Given that artificial intelligence and platform digital infrastructure increasingly mediate public communication, access to information, and political decision-making, it has become an urgent task to reflect philosophically and politically on what this transformation does to public rationality — the collective capacity of citizens to form reasoned judgments about matters of common concern in a generally accessible space. This thesis addresses the relationship between the attention economy, algorithmic power, and the conditions of democratic deliberation, with an emphasis on how digital technologies weaken these conditions.